

CONTRIBUTORS

WARWICK ANDERSON is Associate Professor of the History and Philosophy of Science and Director of the Centre for the Study of Health and Society at the University of Melbourne. He has published widely on the history of American public health and on race and colonialism in Southeast Asia. His current project is a history of racial and environmental thought in Australia.

EMILY BOOTH is a Ph.D. student in the History Department at LaTrobe University, where she is studying the work of early modern British anatomists.

JANET McCALMAN is based at the Centre for the Study of Health and Society and teaches in the History Department and in the History and Philosophy of Science Department of the University of Melbourne. Her most recent publication is Sex and Suffering: Women's Health and a Women's Hospital. She has recently received a large ARC grant to investigate the health and social destinies of babies born between 1857 and 1936 at the Royal Women's Hospital, Melbourne.

SIOBAN NELSON is a postdoctoral fellow at the School of Post-Graduate Nursing at the University of Melbourne, where she is conducting research on the religious origins of nursing in Australia. Dr Nelson has established a new Australian Nursing History Project.

JAMES T. PATTERSON is Professor of History at Brown University, Rhode Island. An eminent American social historian, he has written The Dread Disease (a history of American attitudes toward cancer) and Grand Expectations: The United States, 1945-74.

JOHN PEARN is Professor of Child Health at the University of Queensland and the Past President of the Australian Society for the History of Medicine. He has published prolifically on the history of medicine in Australia.

KAY TORNEY SOUTER teaches in the English Department at LaTrobe University. She is especially interested in using psychoanalytic and literary methods to understand disease and medical care.