WARWICK ANDERSON, on leave from his position as Director of the Centre for the Study of Health & Society at the University of Melbourne, is currently directing the History of Health Sciences Program at UCSF and UC–Berkeley in San Francisco. He has published widely on the history of American health and on race and colonialism in South-East Asia, and his book The Cultivation of Whiteness: Science, Health and Racial Destiny in Australia is being published by Melbourne University Press in 2001.

LINDA BRYDER had her Oxford DPhil published in 1988 as Below the Magic Mountain: A Social History of Tuberculosis in Twentieth-Century Britain. Since then she has published widely on the history of tuberculosis. Now a senior lecturer at Auckland University, she edited A Healthy Country: Essays on the Social History of Medicine in New Zealand (1991), and convened an international conference on the history of medicine in Auckland and jointly edited the proceedings (New Countries and Old Medicine, 1995) with Derek Dow. She is currently completing a manuscript on the history of infant health and welfare in New Zealand, and is a member of the Advisory Editorial Board of Health & History.

DEREK DOW has worked in New Zealand as a freelance historian since 1990. His publications include an Annotated Bibliography for the History of Medicine and Health in New Zealand (1994), Safeguarding the Public Health: A History of the New Zealand Department of Health (1995), and Maori Health & Government Policy 1840–1940 (1999). He is currently working on a sequel to this, covering the years 1940 to 2000.

AROHA HARRIS lectures in the History Department at Auckland University, where she is also completing her PhD looking at continuity and change in Maori communities, 1945–75. Her interests include oral histories, community histories and Maori Affairs policy, especially Maori land development. She has a research background in the areas of Treaty of Waitangi claims and health and social services for Maori.

HELEN MOUNTAIN HARTE, who has a Masters in Education from Auckland University, taught in New Zealand primary and secondary schools for almost twenty years. In addition to her research into Maori health, she writes and illustrates children's stories and designs greetings cards.

JANET McCALMAN is the Deputy Director of the Centre for the Study of Health & Society and directs the Centre's program of 'Australian Witnesses to Twentieth Century Medicine'. In June 2001 she will become Head of the History and Philosophy of Science Department at the University of Melbourne. Her most recent publication is Sex and Suffering: Women's Health and a Women's Hospital.

KATHRYN ROBERTSON is both a General Practitioner in Watsonia, Melbourne, and a Senior Lecturer in the Department of General Practice at the University of Melbourne.

TOEOLESULUSULU DAMON SALESA, a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University, recently submitted his DPhil thesis entitled Race Mixing: A Victorian Problem in Britain and New Zealand 1830s–1870. His book 'Troublesome Half-Castes: A Samoan Borderland 1830–1900' is due out soon in the Journal of Pacific History monograph series. He is currently the 2001 Research Fellow at the National Library of New Zealand.
