

Contributors

WARWICK ANDERSON, on leave from his position as Director of the Centre for the Study of Health & Society at the University of Melbourne, is currently directing the History of Health Sciences Program at UCSF and UC–Berkeley in San Francisco. He has published widely on the history of American health and on race and colonialism in South-East Asia, and his book The Cultivation of Whiteness: Science, Health and Racial Destiny in Australia is being published by Melbourne University Press in 2002.

CATHARINE COLEBORNE lectures in world history, Australian history and the social history of sickness and health at the University of Waikato, New Zealand. She is the author of several articles and chapters on the history of the asylum and its patients in Victoria and is the co-editor (with Diane Kirkby) of Law, History and Colonialism: Empires' Reach (Manchester University Press, forthcoming).

BARRY FIRKIN was a former head of Department of Medicine at Monash University. He died on 12 January 2001. A tribute to Emeritus Professor Firkin can be found in this edition of Health & History.

ROBIN HAINES, author of Emigration and the Labouring Poor: Australian Recruitment in Britain and Ireland (Macmillan, London, 1997), is an Australian Research Council Queen Elizabeth II Fellow in the History Department at Flinders University. She has published widely in the history of nineteenth-century immigration, and on maritime health and disease. Her book Charles Trevelyan and the Great Irish Famine is to be published in Ireland in 2002, and she is also working on the monograph Passage to Australia: Life and Death in the Age of Sail.

ROD HOME is Professor in the History and Philosophy of Science Department, University of Melbourne.

NILS KORNER worked as a diagnostic radiologist and consultant physician in private practice and in the NSW public hospital system during the implementation of Medibank and later Medicare. He was active in the National Association of Medical Specialists in the decade from its formulation in 1972 and served both as its federal secretary and as chair of its NSW branch. He has published papers on cardiovascular disease in Papua New Guinea, diagnostic radiology in the medical curriculum, and alkaline phosphatase metabolism.

PAUL SENDZIUK is a doctoral student in the Department of History at Monash University. He is currently completing a thesis titled Learning to Trust: A History of Australian Responses to AIDS.

BARRY SMITH is an Emeritus Professor at the Research School of Social Sciences, Australian National University, Canberra.

VIRGINIA THORLEY is currently enrolled as a PhD student, part-time, in the Department of History, University of Queensland. Her MA was on infant feeding advice received by Queensland mothers in the post-war period, 1945–1965. As Virginia Phillips, she is the author of Successful Breastfeeding (NMAA) and Feeding Baby and Child: A Guide for Australian Parents (Hyland House). She is a lactation consultant, and has special interests in self-help groups in the health area (as well as specific clinical interests).

DI TIBBITS is a Fellow of the Centre for the Study of Health and Society at the University of Melbourne and is currently President of the Medical History Society of Victoria, Vice-President of the Australian Society of the History of Medicine (ASHM), and Conference Secretary of the ASHM Biennial Conference, which is to be held in Melbourne 2003.

MICHAEL TYQUIN is a consulting historian from Sydney. He has published extensively in the health field including a monogram on the Australian medical services at Gallipoli and two biographies of Australian army medical officers. He is also a serving officer in the Royal Australian Army Medical Corps.